Main idea is for nonfiction, of course, and the central message is for fiction only. Another difference is that the main idea is more often stated, while the central message is implied, with the exception of some fables. Students will need to make inferences from the clues provided in the story to piece together the central message. 2.

Today I'm linking up with The Reading Crew to share mentor texts for various comprehension strategies. One of my FAVORITE books is an oldie but a goodie and it's the PERFECT mentor text for teaching central message or lesson. Dandelion was published in 1977 (two weeks before I was born-ha!) It was written by Don Freeman, the author of Corduroy.

An article was published on the website "Autistic, Not Weird" today titled "Ten vital reasons to never, ever share an autism meltdown video." I've never had a meltdown before, but the idea of being filmed in the midst of one and the video then being uploaded to social media sites without my permission is a horrifying thought.

WASHINGTON — With Donald Trump's election messaging changing almost every day, congressional Republicans are struggling to find a central GOP slogan of their own. Roughly 100 days before the election, Trump and other Republicans are all over the place. Sometimes touting the economy (or the economy that used to be before the coronavirus). Sometimes pitching ...
